week, Molbert said. The food bank also plans to create additional mobile food pantry routes and pop-up food pantries throughout November.

The money for WIC, which provides nutrition assistance for low-income women with children up to age five, ensures the program is funded through the rest of November, said interim Health and Human Services Commissioner Pat Traynor.

"We should absolutely make sure there's no hunger with that program," Traynor said. "That program has been absolutely fortified to make sure there's no hunger with that program."

Armstrong said tapping the Health and Human Services contingency funding uses resources already available to deploy services, without new appropriations or moving money from line items.

"We don't know if we're getting refunded by the federal government, and quite honestly, we don't care right now," Armstrong said. "This is about deploying this stuff out and getting it out."

Dakotans to donate their time or money to food banks and other organizations that help people. Molbert suggested people reach out to local food pantries to see if they need volunteers to help with increased traffic and amount of food.

While SNAP benefits will run out if the shutdown continues after Nov. 1, a North Dakota program to provide free and reduced-price lunches for North Dakota students will not be affected, North Dakota Department of Public Instruction Superintendent Kirsten Baesler confirmed Thursday. While families who qualify for SNAP are automatically eligible for free or reduced-price school meals, the meals are separate from SNAP.

Students who qualify for the meals will continue to get them for the remainder of the school year, the statement said.

North Dakotans with questions about nutrition programs like SNAP or WIC can call Health and Human Services at 701-328-1000.
